The dat. pronoun was subsequently changed into the nominative, I, we, were better (perh. because in sbs. the two cases were no longer distinguished). Finally this was given up for the current I had better = I should have or hold it better, to do, etc. (Mr. F. Hall has shown that in these changes, better followed in the main the analogy of liefer and rather.) See HAVE.

Between (bĭ,twī·n), prep. and adv. Forms: α. 1 bi-, betweonum, -an, -twinum, -an, -twynum, -an, 2–3 bitweone(n, -twene(n, bitwine, 3 bitweounen, 3–4 bituene, 4 bituine, bytwyne, betwene. β. 1 bi-, betwion, -tuien, bitwien, -twen, -twin, betweon, 2 bitweon, -twon, 2–3 bitwien, 3–4 bitwen, -tuen, (bitwhen, bepwen). α. β. (4–5 betweyn(e), 4–6 bi-, betwen(e, (5 bytwyen, betwyn), 5–7 betweene, 6– between. [The modern between combines two earlier forms: α. OE. bi-, betwēonum, etc., ME. bitwenen, -twene; β. OE. bi-, betwēon, etc., ME. bitwēn; see BE-. In betwēonum, Mercian betwīnum, the second element represents an original OE. dative twīhnum*, tweohnum*. In betwēon (only a northern form, Rushworth Gosp. bi-, betwion, betweon, Lindisf. bi-, betuien, bitwēn, Durh. Ritual bitwien, -twēn, -twīn), the second element points back, according to Sievers, through earlier twīhen*, twīhon*, to an orig. OE. acc. twīhn (cf. bituichn in Erfurt Gloss.). These, twīhnurt*, twīhn*, answer respectively to Goth. tweihnaim dat. pl., and tweihna acc. pl. neuter, of the distributive numeral tweih-nai 'two each', a derivative of twa TWO (= L. bī-nī, for dwī-nī* 'two each'), which appears also, but with the simple sense of 'two' (nom. masc.), in OS. and OFris. twēne, OHG., MHG. zwēne (early mod.G. zween). Betwēonum, later betwēonan, gave the prevailing ME. form bitwenen, reduced before a consonant, and at length generally, to bitwene; bitwen was mostly northern. But after 1400, when final -e became mute, and was omitted in writing, or retained only as a sign of a preceding long vowel, both forms necessarily coalesced in betwene (= betwēn), whence mod. between. In OE. the original construction was bi sǽm twéonum, lit. 'by seas twain'; thence through constructions like frið freondum bi twéon 'peace friends between,' bi twéonum, bi twéon coalesced into prepositions. (Cf. the history of to(us)-ward, to-ward, toward.)

Intimately related to between, alike in their elements, and in the process by which these coalesced, are its synonyms BETWIXT, in ME. betwix, and † BETWIXEN, † BETWIN, † BITWINEN, † BITWIXEN. Bitwih was actually, in its origin, a doublet of OE. betwéon, and betwihen an expansion of that, on the analogy of betweonen. Betwixen and betwix were a parallel pair, formed on the OTeut. adj. twíxlí- 'two-fold.' (See Sievers Misc. zur Agz. Gram. § 329.) Bitwih died a 1200, bitwihen a 1300, betwixen a 1300; betwixt is now archaic, between is the living word.]

V. 19. In all senses, between has been, from its earliest appearance, extended to more than two. In OE. and ME. it was so extended in sense I, in which AMONG is now considered better. It is still the only word available to express the relation of a thing to many surrounding things severally and individually, among expressing a relation to them collectively and vaguely: we should not say 'the space lying among the three points,' or 'a treaty among three powers,' or 'the choice lies among the three candidates in the select list,' or 'to insert a needle among the closed petals of a flower.'

(Cf. the shortened wolc from wolcen, also history of BITWIH.) It is however also possible that be tweox goes back through tweohsu* to twiscu* acc. pl. neuter. Much more common in OE. than the preceding. In ME. betwix seems to have been more northern, betwixen, betwixe, more southern; in the 15th c. the loss of the final syllable of the latter finally levelled both as betwix. Already in OE., there appeared occasional instances of betwuxt, -twyxt, with a -t, either phonetic or analogical, but having no significance. This was also rare in ME., but after 1500 became the regular form, except in the north, which retained betwix. In 18th c. Sc. betwish, betweesh; cf. G. zwischen. (ME. had occasionally bitwixte, prob. a confusion between bitwixt and bitwixe.) There is a late shortened form 'twixt.]

Bewape, variant of BEWHAPE v. Obs.

Beware (bĭwē·ɹ), v[1]. Forms: 2 ben war, 3-6 be war, be-war, 3-7 bewar, 3-5 be-warr, 5 by-war, 5-6 be ware, 6 bewarre, be wayre, 6- be-ware. [The origin of this is involved: 1. OE. had a trans. vb. warian 'to guard, take care or charge of,' with a compound bewarian 'to defend.' The latter is not certainly found in ME. (where it would have been bewaren); the former survived as WARE, common till 1500 with a dative refl. const., esp. in the imperative ware thee! 'cave tibi, take care of thyself, be on your guard, beware!'; and has been retained down to the present day in the simple imperative ware!, as 'Ware holes!' (although in this form it has often since 1600 been mistaken for a contraction of beware! or an interjectional use of the adjective). 2. OE. had also an adj. wær 'cautus, cautious, on one's guard,' which survived in ME. as war, ware, common in the phrase to be ware 'to be on one's guard,' of which the imperative be ware! was practically = ware thee! aforesaid. 3. From this equivalence of meaning, be ware early began to be treated in some respects as a single word, viz. as a compound of the vb. ware, thus stepping into the place of the OE. bewarian. As early as 1300 we find it written as one word, and even with by as the prefix, and in 14-15th c. it often followed the verbal constructions of the simple ware, even to taking a direct object, as in 'beware that train' (c 1500 in 1 e). But on the other hand it was used only in those parts of the vb. where be is found, viz. the imper., infin., and pres. subj. (the indic. being I am ware, thou art ware, etc.). After 1600, the verbal aspect so far prevailed that the inflexions bewares, bewared, bewaring, were used by good writers; but these have again been discarded, and beware is now used only where be ware would be a possible construction, viz. in the imper. (chiefly), the infin., and pres. subj (rarely). The full evidence of these statements will be found under WARE: the following quotations show the relations of to be ware, to ware oneself, ware thee, ware to thee, be ware to thee, beware thee, beware thyself, before 1500.

Bi, ME. variant of By, a town.

Bi, freq. ME. spelling of By prep.: the same as Bi- pref.[1], the early OE., and the ordinary ME., form of the prefix Be-; under which spelling see most of the words. Those alone are left under Bi- which did not survive long enough to be spelt with be-.

Bi- pref.[2], a. L. bi- (earlier dui-, cogn. with Gr. δι-, Skr. dvi-) 'twice, doubly, having two, two-,' which is in Latin a prefix of adjs., occas. of sbs., rarely of vbs. (e. g. bipertīre). The earliest Latin adjs. of this type are formed by simply prefixing bi- either to adj.- (and verb-) stems, as bifer, bifidus, bijugus, bisonus, or to sb.- (and adj.-) stems, as bicolor, biceps, bifrons, bifurcus, bigener; later in all probability, and more evidently mere compounds, are those in which bi- is prefixed to an adj. with a thematic suffix, as bicorniger, bicubitālis, bilongus, bipatens, and these are occas. participial in form, as bicamerātus, biformātus. The Latin sbs., ending usually in -ium, are formed on the prec. adjs., or possible ones of corresponding type, as biennium a space of two years, biennis lasting two years, biclinium, biclinus*.

The prefix entered Eng. in composition, e. g. in bigam (=med.L. bigamus), found c 1300, bicorne, c 1420; bifront, biforked occur late in 16th c.; and from the 17th c. onward, by a wide extension of the Latin analogy, especially in its later phases, bi- has been prefixed to any adj. conveniently indicating the thing or quality which is to be described as doubled or occurring twice, principally to those of Latin etymology, as in biangular, bicavitary, bicentral, bivaulted, bivoluminous, but also to others as birainy, biweekly. In modern scientific terminology, adjs. in -ate, -ated are most frequently employed, as biauriculate, bicarinate, bilamellate, bipinnate, biunguiculate, bimaculated; and the attrib. use of sbs. as adjs. tends to such modern forms as bichord, biwhirl. (See also the form Bin-.)

Bi- is therefore used in Eng. to form:—

2. A term at bowls, applied alike to: The construction or form of the bowl imparting an oblique motion, the oblique line in which it runs, and the kind of impetus given to cause it to run obliquely. Thus a bowl is said 'to have a wide or narrow bias,' 'to run with a great' or 'little bias'; the player 'gives it more' or 'less bias' in throwing it.

It is difficult to decide in which sense exactly bias was here first used. A priori we think of the oblique line of motion: this is favoured also by the quotations under C. and Bias-wise; yet early quotations here point

(= Pr. bibla, Sp. and Pg. biblia, It. bibbia; whence also Ger. bibel, Du. bijbel, all fem.):—Late L. biblia fem. sing., for earlier biblia neut. pl., the Scriptures, a. Gr. τὰ βιβλία, lit. 'the books,' in later Christian writers spec. 'the canonical books, the Scriptures.'

The Gr. βιβλία was pl. of βιβλίον, dim. of βίβλος (1. the inner bark of the papyrus, 'paper'; 2. a paper, scroll, roll, or book), which had ceased to have a diminutive sense, and was the ordinary word for 'book,' whether as a distinct treatise, or as a subdivision of a treatise, before its application to the Jewish and Christian Scriptures. In reference to the former, see τὰ βιβλία τὰ ἁγια 'the holy books,' in 1 Macc. xii. 9: in Clemens Alex. probably, and Origen (in Joannem v. iv., ed. Lomm I. 168) c 229, certainly, τὰ βιβλία include the N. Test. books. In Latin, the first appearance of biblia is not ascertained. Jerome uses bibliothĕca for the Scriptures, and this name continued in literary use for several centuries. Of biblia, Becker, Catal. Biblioth. Antiq. 42, has a 9th c. example (see also those under sense 1 below); but the evidence of the Romanic langs. shows that biblia must have been the popular name, and have been treated as a fem. sing., much earlier than this. The common change of a Lat. neuter pl. into a fem. sing. in -a (as in arma, battalia, folia, gaudia, gesta, opera, etc.) was in the case of biblia facilitated by the habit of regarding the Scriptures as one work. In OE. bibliopĕce alone occurs; in Anglo-Latin biblia and bibliothĕca interchange in the 11th c. catalogue of the library of Lindisfarne; in the 13th c. catalogue of the Durham books only biblia occurs.]

[Bicched appears rather early to be certainly referable to BITCH in an opprobrious sense, from which moreover the formation is not easily explained (for shrewed there was a verb to shrew.) The conjecture has been offered that it was a contracted form of ME. biwicced 'bewitched'; but for this no evidence or analogy has been found. In bicched bones applied to dice, some have suggested a corruption of Du. bikbeł 'knuckle-bone, astragalus, cockal, bone-plaything, dice, marbles,' Ger. bickel 'ankle, ankle-bone, astragalus, die, dice'; this is possible, but would suppose an Eng. series bikbil*, bicckel*, biccke, biecked bone, of which the most important links are neither represented nor accounted for, and it would only show assimilation of bikbel* to the opprobrious bicched, leaving the latter unexplained. That bicched bone could be for a Du. bikbed been* 'bone picked with holes or pips,' is highly improbable: moreover, this would not connect the expression with Du. bikbel, since the latter (whether or not connected with bikkel a pickaxe, bikken to pick, or notch) certainly did not mean 'bone picked with holes,' but was a name of the ankle, and of the astragalus or knuckle-bone used in play, long before it passed over to dice. [ME. biker, like the associated verb bikeren, of uncertain origin: nor can it be said whether the sb. is derived from the verb or vice versâ. So far as evidence goes, the sb. appears earlier, and might, as in battle, quarrel, skirmish, be the source. On the other hand, the verb has the form of a frequentative, as in sputter, totter, flutter, etc., which is in favour of its priority. Mätzner and Skeat would see in it the freq. of the rare and somewhat doubtful bike 'to thrust, strike with a pointed weapon,' noted under BEAK v. 3, q.v. The obs. Welsh bicra is not native.]

[A. OE. bīodan, bēad, budon, boden, = OS. biodan (MDu. and Du. bieden), OHG. biotan (MHG. and mod.G. bieten), ON. bjóða, Goth. biudan (pa. t. bauþ, budum, pple. budans):—OTeut. beudan* 'to stretch out, reach out, offer, present,' hence 'to communicate, inform, announce, proclaim, command'; pre-Teutonic bheudh-*, cogn. with Skr. budh to present, and perh. with Gr. πυθ- (for φυθ-) in πυθέσθαι 'to inform oneself.' From the pa pple. boden was derived the sb. boda messenger, whence the vb. bodian to BODE, announce. The normal ME. forms were bēde(n, pa. t. bead, bēd, beed, pl. buden, pa. pple. boden. But by form-levelling, the pa. t. had also pl. bēden, bēd(e from the sing.; and later also bod(e, by assimilation to the pa. pple.

B. OE. biddan, bæd, bǣdum, beden, = OS. biddian (MDu. and Du. bidden), OHG. and mod.G. bitten, ON. biðja, Goth. bidjan (pa. t. bap, bēdum, pple. bidans):— OTeut. bidjan*, assigned to a pre-Teutonic bhedh-* 'to press' (cf. Skr. bādhate to press), whence the senses 'to ask pressingly, beg, pray, require, demand, command.' (Osthoff would connect bidjan with Gr. πεύθω.) The normal ME. forms were bidde n, pa. t. bad, pl. beaden, bede(n, pa. pple. beden. By form-levelling the pa. t. had also occasionally sing. bead, bēd, beed, and at length pl. baden, bade, bad; and the pa. pple. became bidden, whence also a later pa. t. bid.

C. Thus the sense 'command' had been developed in both verbs already in OE. The past tenses were further confused in form in ME. The result was the frequent substitution of the forms of one verb for the other, in other senses also, and their total confusion after 1400–1500. As a whole, the forms of biddan, bid are those which survive in literary Eng., but in the dialects these are quite mixed, in such conjugations as bid, bad or bade, bidden or budden. Senses survive from both verbs, though mostly archaic, or in certain unanalysed phrases, as to 'bid farewell,' 'bid a truce,' 'bid fair'; the chief modern use is that of 'bid at an auction,' 'bid for votes or support,' which belongs to bede. The senses of 'invite' and 'order' are in every-day use in the north, but archaic in southern speech, where 'bid him do it' is regularly made 'tell him to do it.' Particular forms of the pa. t. and pa. pple. are preferred with particular senses.]

A. Senses originating from OE. béodan, ME. bede, but taking eventually the form bid).

The bede quotations are marked α, the bid quotations β.

6. Bidding of beads, beads-bidding; bidding of prayers, bidding prayer. As to these expressions there has been a series of curious misapprehensions. The original meaning down to the Reformation was 'praying of prayers,' i. e. saying of prayers, praying; cf. BID v. 7 e. From an early date in the Christian church, it was the custom to request the prayers of the faithful in behalf of certain persons and things; and in the 16th c., in England, forms of allocution or direction to the congregation, telling them whom and what to remember in 'bidding their beads' or 'prayers' were authoritatively put forth. As bid in the sense of 'pray' was now becoming obsolete, the meaning of the expression was forgotten after the Reformation, and bid taken in the sense of 'order, direct,' so that in the reign of Elizabeth the 'bidding of prayers' was applied to the allocution itself, as if = 'the directing or injoining of prayers.' With the later use of the vbl. sb. as a gerund directly governing an object, we have in the 17th c. 'the form of bidding prayers' or 'prayer' (= precationem hortandi); and later still, a misunderstanding of the grammatical construction in this phrase has given rise to the vulgar error of calling this exhortation to the people (in which 'concionatores populum hortabuntur ut seeum in precibus concurrat' Sparrow Collect. Articles, 1671) 'the bidding-prayer,' as if it were itself a kind of prayer qualified by the attribute 'bidding.'

[In OF. Bigot appears first in the romance of Girart de Roussillon (12th c.) as the proper name of some people, apparently of the south of Gaul. Hence already in the 17th c. it was suggested by Casenauve, that it might be an OF. form of Wisigothus, Visigoth; the relations between the Visigoths of Toulouse who were Arians, and the Franks who were Catholics, being such as readily to attach to the name of the former the connotation of 'detestable foreigner' or 'foreign heretic.' But modern Romanic scholars find phonetic difficulties, besides that there is no evidence that the name Wisigothi was preserved in the vulgar tongue. Slender support to some connexion with the Goths is suggested by the med. L. form Bigothi (Du Cange). Whether the Sp. bigote, moustache, is in any way connected, cannot be decided. According to Wace bigus, bigue was applied opprobriously by the French to the Normans, which shows that the word had then acquired some connotative force; the legend that it originated in the refusal of Hrolf or Rollo to kiss the foot of Charles the Simple, when, in the words of the 12th c. chronicler, 'lingua Anglica (!!) respondit Ne se, bi got, quod interpretatur Ne per Deum' (No by God!), is absurdly incongruous with facts. The opprobrious sense in Wace was certainly not that of 'superstitious' or 'hypocrite,' as in later F. and Eng.; materials to show how the latter was developed are wanting, but there is evidence to show that the feminine bigote was subsequently applied in opprobrium to the Beguines (see Begute, Biguta, in Du Cange): our first quotation identifies bigot with bigin or beguine. In early times the word became a Norman family name as in Roger Bigod earl of Norfolk.]

Franck compares Du. been, MDu. bunne fem. 'fish-cauf.' Others would refer OE. binne directly to late L. benna, applied to various vessels or receptacles, among others to a 'hamper' and a 'vivarium' for fish, and apparently identical with benna, given by Festus as a Gaulish name for a kind of vehicle (cf. Welsh ben 'cart, wagon'), inferred to have been a wicker- or basket-cart, which sense, with that of 'panier for pack-horse,' 'large creel,' etc., is preserved in It. benna wicker-work sleigh, dung-cart, F. benne 'grape-gatherer's creel, fish-cauf, basket-cart for charcoal,' banne panier, basket-cart (also mod.G. benne, Du. benne, ben, large basket, adopted from Fr., It., or med.L.). If OCeltic bunna orig. meant a wicker-work panier (with or without wheels), a root ben-, bun- to twist, plait, may as Franck suggests have been common to Celtic and Teutonic. (See Diez, Du Cange benna, in Littré, Scheler benne, in Franck ben, bun.)]

Bin-, pref., treated as a euphonic form of BI- pref.[2], used before vowels. Not found in L.: it seems to have originated in Fr. with the word binocle, which was probably formed from L. bīnī two together, a pair of (boves bini a pair of oxen yoked together). From binocle, binocular, bin- has been extended in English to other words, esp. chemical compounds (see BI- pref.[2] III) as binacetate, biniodide, binoxalate, binoxide (for which Fr. has bioxyde). The phonetic analogy of a- an, co- con-, has probably influenced this Eng. use.

2. Any feathered vertebrate animal: a member of the second class (Aves) of the great Vertebrate group, the species of which are most nearly allied to the Reptiles, but distinguished by their warm blood, feathers, and adaptation of the fore limbs as wings, with which most species fly in the air.

Now used generically in place of the older name FOWL, which has become specialized for certain kinds of poultry, and by sportsmen for wild ducks and wild geese. In this sense, bird, ME. brid, is found in the south c 1300; it appears to have been extended from the young of birds (sense 1) at first to the smaller kinds, Chaucer's 'smale foules.' So late as a century ago, Dr. Johnson says (1755–73) 'In common talk fowl is used for the larger, and bird for the smaller kind of feathered animals'; and this distinction still obtains to some extent dialectally. (In Scotland large birds e. g. hawks, herons, are 'fowls,' small birds, as well as chickens, are 'birds.') A further process of specialization (cf. the histories of fowl, deer, beast), seems still to be in progress in regard to bird, as witness its technical use by game-preservers (sense 3).

1. A kind of crisp dry bread more or less hard, prepared generally in thin flat cakes. The essential ingredients are flour and water, or milk, without leaven; but confectionery and fancy biscuits are very variously composed and flavoured. Even the characteristic of hardness implied in the name is lost in the sense 'A kind of small, baked cake, usually fermented, made of flour, milk, etc.' used, according to Webster, in U.S.

1. A spiritual superintendent or overseer in the Christian Church.

a. Used in the New Testament versions to render the Gr. word ἐπίσκοπος, applied to certain officers in early Christian churches, either as a descriptive term, or as their actual title. In Wyclif, the Rhemish, and Revised Versions, the Gr. word is so rendered in every instance; but in the other versions from Tindale to 1611, it is in Acts xx. 28 (where applied to the πρεσβύτεροι or 'elders' of Ephesus) rendered 'overseers.' Also applied to Christ, as descriptive of his office. (Sometimes applied by those who do not recognize the episcopal order, to their pastor or chief elder, but only as a descriptive term, or as identifying his office with that of the New Testament 'bishop.')

1382 WYCLIF Acts xx. 28 Al the folk in which the Hooly Gost sette 3ou bischopis. 1868 LIGHTFOOT Philippians 93 It is a fact now generally recognized by theologians of all shades of opinion, that in the language of the New Testament the same officer in the Church is called indifferently 'bishop' (ἐπίσκοπος) and 'elder' or 'presbyter' (πρεσβύτερος).

b. spec. In the Eastern, Western, Anglican, and other churches of episcopal order: A clergyman consecrated for the spiritual government and direction of a 'diocese,' ranking beneath an archbishop (where these exist) and above the priests or presbyters, and deacons. (This is the sense in which the word passed with Christianity into all the Teutonic langs., and thus the earliest sense in English.)

Bishop in partibus (infidelium) in R. C. Ch., one dignified with the title of a bishopric, whose district or diocese is in the possession of infidels or heretics; originally applied to those expelled from the Holy Land by the Saracens.

It is in Minsheu, Coles, Phillips 1678–1706, and Kersey; but not in Cockeram, Blount, Bailey 1721–90, Johnson, nor Richardson 1836–55: it was added by Todd to Johnson, 1818. 1. orig. A species of Wild Ox (Bos Bison Gesn., B. bonasus Linn.), formerly prevalent in Europe, including Great Britain, and still existing in a protected state in forests of Lithuania. (This was the βλοων of Pausanias and Oppian, the βόνασος of Aristotle and Ælian, the bison and bonāsus of Pliny and Solinus, the bison of Seneca and Martial; pl. bisontes, in later writers visontes, vesontes, bistontes. It is now sometimes called the Aurochs, a name belonging rightly to the extinct Bos Urus, the Urus of Cæsar. See the exhaustive article Wisunt, in Schade, Altdeutsches Wbch.)

Of these Franck takes the Flemish bijstier as apparently the most etymological form, and would refer it to an OTeut. bi-stiurī* with the notion of 'deranged, disturbed, amazed.' If this be the derivation, these words can hardly be related to the Fr. bistre, as they might be if 'gloomy, dark' were the radical notion. Mr. H. Bradley compares OF. behistre, beistre, var. of besistre bissextile, meaning, 1. the bissextile day in February, 2. unlucky event, disaster, calamity, 3. 'a horrible storm or tempest in the aire' (Cotgr.); whence the notions of 'dismal, gloomy, grim, raging, etc.' might be plausibly derived; but historical evidence as to connexion between the various words is wanting.]

Bivouac (bi·vwæk, bi·vu,æk). Forms: 8 bi·ouac, bibovac, biovac, 9 bivuack, bivouack, (bivouake), bivouaque, 8- bivouac. [In Dictionaries since c 1700, but hardly in use before the French War: a. F. bivouac, bivac, generally said to have been introduced during the Thirty Years' War. It has with probability been referred to a dialectal (Swiss) Ger. beiwacht, according to Stalder, Versuch eines Schweizerischen Idiotikon (1812) II. 426, used in Aargau and Zürich to denote the patrol of citizens (Schaarwache) added (beigegeben) to assist the ordinary town watch by night at any time of special commotion. This remaining of a large body of men under arms all night explains the original sense of bivouac.]

1. Mil. Originally, a night-watch by a whole army under arms, to prevent surprise; now, a temporary encampment of troops in the field with only the accidental shelter of the place, without tents, etc.; also the place of such encampment.

Bla(a, Blaad: see BLAE, BLAD, BLADE.

Blab (blæb), sb.[1] Forms: 4–7 blabbe, 6– blab. [The history of blab and blabber, and the question of their mutual relations, if any, is very obscure. Blabbe sb. 'chatterer' occurs in Chaucer c 1374, and is very common thenceforth; blab sb. 'chatter, loose talk' is in Tale of Beryn (c 1400), but has not been found elsewhere before the 16th c., when appears also blab vb. 'to chatter' (1535), followed in course by its agent noun blabber. But the vb. blabber is earlier than any of these; it occurs in Piers Ploughman (1362), and is (with its deriv. blabberer) very common in Wyclif; the facts thus forbid us to take blabber as a frequentative derivative of blab vb.; while no analogy exists for the formation of either (of the only two early words) blabbe sb., blabber vb., from the other. It would be hardly justifiable to assume blabbe to be a 14th c. abbreviation of blabberer. For forms akin to blabber in other langs. see that word. With blabbe we have to compare a sb. labbe 'revealer of secrets, blabber,' in Chaucer, and a vb. labbe of same age in P. Ploughman, with pple. labbyng 'blabbing, open-mouthed,' also in Chaucer, identical with OIDu. labben to chatter 'garrire' (Stratm.). Blabbe might be a mixed form due to association of labbe and blabber; but may also be purely onomatopœic. Cf. BABBLE.]

1. An open mouthed person, one who has not sufficient control over his tongue; a revealer of secrets or of what ought to be kept private; a babbler, tattler, or tell-tale; used also of the tongue. (Exceedingly common in 16th and 17th c.; unusual in literature since c 1750.)

But the evidence is not sufficient to show whether any of these were actually connected with the English word, or whether they agree only in being natural expressions of the action involved, which seems to be essentially that of producing a confused repetition or combination of labial (b) and lingual (l, r) sounds. It is noteworthy that in the earliest instance quoted, blaberde varies in the MSS. with babeled, bablide, etc.: cf. Babble. See further under Blab.]

In OE., found also (as the metres show) with long vowel blāce, blācan, and thus confused with blāc shining, white:—OTeut. blaiko-* (see Blake), as is shown by the fact that the latter also occurs with short vowel, blăc, blăcum; in ME. the two words are often distinguishable only by the context, and sometimes not by that. (Cf. ¶ 7.) ON. blakkr is not an exact phonetic equivalent, but, if native, points to an OTeut. blakko-* (for blakno: see Kluge Beitr. ix. 162). Sievers suggests that the original Teutonic types were blæk kno-, blakko-, subsequently levelled to blækko-, blako-, blakko-, giving the OE. and ON. words; in this case blæk-no-* might be pa. pple. of a vb. blækan* to burn (cogn. w. Gr. φλέγειν), and the original sense 'burnt, scorched.' Cf. Blatch, which points to an OTeut. blakkjo-*, from blakko-. In Eng. black has quite displaced the original colour-word Swart, which remains in the other Teutonic languages.]

Blackguard (blăgărd), sb. and a. (Written 6–8 as two words, 7–8 with hyphen, 8–9 as one word.) [lit. Black Guard, concerning the original application of which there is some doubt. It is possible that senses 1 and 2 began independently of each other; or the one may have originated in a play upon the other, black being taken with a different sense; it would be difficult to assign priority to either. It is even possible that there may have been a guard of soldiers at Westminster called the Black Guard, or that, as some suggest, the attendants or torch-bearers at a funeral, or the link-boys of the streets, may have had this name.]

The following quotations, including the earliest known, show this uncertainty: they may belong to ascertained senses, but cannot be certainly located:

Blade (blēd). Forms: 1 blæd, 4-5 blad, 5 bladde, blaad(e, blayd, 6 blaid, 3- blade. [Com. Teut.: OE. blæd, neut., (pl. blado, bladu) = OFris. bled, OS. blad (MDu. blat, Du. blad, LG. blad), OHG., MHG. blat (mod.G. blatt), ON. blað (Sw., Da. blad):—OTeut. blado-(m;* perh. a ppl. formation (with suffix -δo- do-:—Aryan -tó-) from OTeut. verbal stem blê-,* see BLOW *v.*2, cognate with L. flos. The long vowel in ME. and modern Eng. appears to be derived from the oblique cases and plural, blād-es, blād-o, made in ME. into blā-des, blā-de. The 15th c. northern spellings blayd, blaid, and Chaucer's dissyllabic blade, bladde, require explanation. The sense-history is notable: in German blatt is the general word for 'leaf,' laub being the foliage collectively of trees; in Norse 'herbs or plants have blað, trees have lauf'; but in OE. lēaf is the general word for 'leaf' and 'foliage'; blæd occurs only once, (as it happens, poetically, in the bréd blado of the plant of wickedness), and this sense is quite absent in ME., while that of the 'blade' of an oar (also in OE.), of a sword or knife, is frequent. It would almost seem then that the modern 'blade' of grass or corn is a later re-transfer from 'sword-blade'; while in regard to corn, there is some reason to suspect influence of med.L. bladum, OF. blad corn, wheat; at least these were evidently supposed to be the same word. The mod.Sc. 'cabbage-blade' also is prob. not directly connected with the OE.; but Norse influence may possibly have contributed to a retention of the vegetable sense in the north.]

I. Of plants.

applied dial. (e.g. in south of Scotland) to a broad flat leaf, as the outer leaves of cabbage or lettuce, the leaves of rhubarb, tobacco, etc.; in literary Eng. only poetically and vaguely for 'leaf.'

Blak, obs. form of Black and of Blake.

† Blake, a. Obs. exc. dial. Also 3–4 blac, blak. [Chiefly northern: probably therefore, since OE. á remained in the north as ā (e. g. ake, stane, mare), blake was the direct phonetic descendant of OE. blâc pale (in early southern ME. bloc, Bloke), a common Teut. adj. = OS. blâk, ON. blakr, OHG. bleih, OTeut. blaiko-z* shining, white, pale, f. root of blîkan to shine, Blike. Cf. the synonyms Bleak, Bleyke, Bloke. In Eng. the notion of 'shining,' i. e. white from excess of light, passed entirely into that of 'pale,' i. e. white from deficiency of colour, dead white. This added to the formal confusion with Black, since 'dark' and 'pale' alike express deficiency or loss of colour.]

1. Pale, pallid, wan: implying deficiency or loss of colour, esp. of the ruddy hue of health, or of the full green of vegetation; of a sickly hue: thus passing on one side into 'ash-coloured, livid,' on another into 'withered yellow,' whence sense 3.

(Many early instances of blake may be examples of blak black, with final e inflexional or phonetic, the context leaving the sense uncertain. Some early forms written blac, blak, also stand for blâk, blake, and belong here. See what is said under Black of the confusion of the forms of blæc and blâc already in OE.)

† Blake, v. Obs. Forms: 1 blâcian, 2–3 blakien, 3–4 blaken, 3–5 blake. [ME. blâke(n, was app. the north. repr. of OE. blâcian to become pale, f. blâc shining, white, pale: see Blake a. The normal southern form would have been blokien, bloke(n, of which there are a few 13th c. instances: see Bloke v. In spelling, this vb. was confounded with blâkien, blâken to grow black or dark (see Black v.); and at length became obs., its place being taken by bleyke(n, bleike(n from ON. and by the cognate bleke(n and Bleach.]

Blatant (blē·tănt), a. Also 6–7 blattant. [Apparently invented by Spenser, and used by him as an epithet of the thousand-tongued monster begotten of Cerberus and Chimæra, the 'blatant' or 'blattant beast', by which he symbolized calumny. It has been suggested that he intended it as an archaic form of bleating (of which the 16th c. Sc. was blaitand), but this seems rather remote from the sense in which he used it. The L. blatīre to babble, may also be compared. (The a was probably short with Spenser: it is now always made long.)]

Blaze (blēz), sb.[2] [Appears first in 17th c.; no corresponding form occurs in OE. or ME. But clearly identical with ON. blesi 'white star on a horse's forehead,' MDu. blesse, Du. bles, mod.G. blässe, blesse, all in same sense, from stem blas-, blæs- shining, white; cf. OHG. blass whitish, MHG. blas bald, mod.G. blass pale. It is possible that the ON. word was adopted in north. dial., and thence passed at a later date into general use; but the Du. or LG. form may also have been introduced as a technical term c 1600.

(In either case the spelling has to be explained: the regular repr. of ON. blesi would have been blese, bleese; if this occurred in north dial., it would be identical with the northern form of BLAZE[1], and might, like it, be made blaze in the literary language; if adapted from Du. or LG., blase must be a phonetic spelling.)]

[In sense 1 apparently the same word as ON. blása to blow (as the wind, with the mouth, bellows, a trumpet), OHG. blâsan (MHG. and mod.G. blâsen), MDu. and Du. blâzen, Goth. -blêsan (in uf-blêsan to blow up, puff up):—OTeut. blês-an*, f. root blê-* (Aryan bhlē-*, L. flā-re: see BLOW) with suffixal -s- (perhaps from the present stem) taken into the root. The verb (blês-an*) was not preserved in OE., where it was represented only by the derivative sb. blæs-t, BLAST 'blowing.' The ME. vb. was prob. a. ON. blása (unless direct connexion with I.G. or Du. blâsen, blâzen, can be traced). Its later history is confused with that of BLAZON, evidently through associating the infinitive blas-en with the pre-existing sb. blason, BLAZON 'shield, heraldic shield.' The proper senses of blase and blason, acted and reacted upon each other in the 16th c.: see senses 3–6, and BLAZON v. 4–6. In later uses of sense 2, there may also be often traced an association with BLAZE v.[1], as if to 'blaze abroad,' were to 'expose to the full blaze of publicity.']

Blazon (blē·z'n), sb. Forms: 4 blasoun, blason, 4–7 blazon, 5 Sc. blasowne, 6– blazon. [a. F. blason (found in other Romanic langs., as Sp. blason, Pg. brasão, It. blasone, Pr. blezo, blizo). By Diez and Littré referred to a Teut. word identical either with Eng. BLAZE *sb.*1 flame, with BLAZE *sb.*2 a conspicuous mark, or with Ger. blasen to blow (BLAZE *v.*2), OHG. blâsâ a trumpeter. But the original meaning of OF. blason was not, as these conjectures assume, 'glory' or 'proclamation,' or even 'armorial shield,' but simply 'shield' in the literal sense. This is proved by the earliest quotations in Fr. and Eng., and by the derived OF. sense of 'shoulder-blade.']

Ble, obs. f. Bleá sb.; var. Blee, Obs., colour, etc.

-ble, a. OF. -ble :—L. -bilem, nom. -bilis, suffix forming verbal adjs., with the sense 'given to, tending to, like to, fit to, able to'; as in sta-bili- 'like, fit to stand.' After consonant stems, -ibili-, as vend-i-bili-, vinc-i-bili-; after stems ending in a, e, i, o, u, -ābili-, -ēbili-, -ībili-, -ōbili-, -ūbili-, as honōrā-bili-, delē-bili-, sepelī-bili-, nō-bili-, volū-bili-. Some of these L. words lived on into OFr., e.g. noble, amable, fleble, meuble; later, these became models for the extensive adoption of others from the Latin of literature. Many of both sorts were from 12th to 15th c. adopted in Eng. from Fr., and here served as models for the direct adoption or formation of others from Latin, a process which has gone on to the present day. By far the most numerous of the -ble words are those in -able. In L., -ābili- adjs. arose only from verbs in -āre; but, in Fr., all pres. ppples. in -ant may give rise to an adj. in -able, and as -ant is now the universal form of pres. ppple., -able is the universal form of the adj. suffix as a living element; -ible being only a fossil survival in words from L. like horrible, possible, visible, not directly attached to a living Fr. verb. When the verb lives in Fr., a modern adj. in -able has always taken the place of the earlier -ible form, as in vendable, croyable, préférable, for L. *vendibilis, credibilis, præferibilis. But in Eng. there is a prevalent feeling for retaining -ible wherever there was or might be a L. -ibilis; while -able is used for words of distinctly Fr. or Eng. origin, as conceivable, movable, speakable. Hence, where there is a verb in French and English, as well as in Latin, English usage is distracted by conflicting and irreconcileable analogies. Thus in the compounds of -fer, L. fero, Latin analogy requires preferible, referible (Walker, Rhym. Dict.), sufferible; French example gives preferable, referable; Fr. and Eng. analogy sufferable (cf. suffering); Eng. analogy (cf. refer-ring) gives referrable (Bailey), conferrable, deferrable; there is also a mongrel spelling referrible, sanctioned by Dr. Johnson, but defensible on no analogy. So with the variant spellings admittable, -ible, tractable, contractible, portable, -ible. These discrepancies no mere etymological grounds can settle; though their number might be lessened by following French precedent and extending -able to all words having a verb (with the same accent) in Eng., thus admittable, contractable, corruptable, exhaustable, vendable, etc., leaving -ible in credible, intelligible, legible, possible, etc. See -able, -ible. The omission or retention of a final e mute before -able is also to a certain extent optional. In words directly from L. it is etymologically absent, as in excusable, declinable; in words from Eng. (beside cases where it must be orthographically retained after c, g, as peaceable, chargeable, the latter also in Fr.), there is a prevalent feeling for retaining the e in monosyllables, as tameable, nameable, saleable, which otherwise would have their meaning obscured (e. g. tamable, namable, salable). This produces ambiguity of form in such words as blamable (F. blâmable,) blameable, movable, moveable, lovable, loveable, sizable, sizeable, etc. As much reason can be given and as much authority cited for one spelling as for the other, and until a reform of Eng. spelling is made, the double form of these words must continue. In words of English formation, a final consonant is usually doubled before -able, when doubled in the pres. ppple., as clubbable, biddable, deferrable. As to the meaning, Palsgrave (1530) says (p. 302):

'Of every adjectyve partyciple..in ant may be formed an adjectyve by chaungynge of ant into able, as of muant, muable; honorant, honorable; .. whose signifycacion may serve bothe actyvely and passively, as muable, apte or mete or able to chaunge, or..to be chaunged; honorable apte or mete or able to honour or..to be honoured.. In this thyng the french tonge is moche more parfyte than our tonge is, for where as they may forme of every partyciple in their tonge an adjectyve endyng in ble, in our tonge we have none suche, but must nedes use circumlocution by .. apte, mete, or able, and our infinityve mode; save that we have admitted as well adjectyves of the frenche tonge endyng in able and ible, as commendable, visible,' etc.

As here stated, adjs. in -bili-, -ble, were originally active (and neuter) as well as passive. Many of the former exist in Eng., e. g. capable, comfortable, suitable, agreeable, conformable, companionable, durable, equable; but the majority have become obsolete or remain only with a passive force, as in credible, audible, flexible, which is also the only use of -able as a living formative, e. g. bearable, eatable, likeable, preferable, insufferable, saleable. (For exhaustive treatment of these words see F. Hall Eng. Adjectives in -able; London 1877.)

Evidently akin to BLAND sb. mixture, and the OE. strong vb. bland-an, ON. blanda (Sw. blanda, Da. blande) to mix: see BLAND v. But the ME. vb. (however the change of vowel may be explained) can hardly have been a continuation of the OE. blandan, since this was all but obsolete already in OE., while blenden was a common word from the 14th c. More probably the latter was an adoption of the ON. blanda (which though originally strong, had subsequently weak inflexions); the change of vowel may also have been due to the ON. sing. present blend, blendr; whether any association with BLEND v.[1] (with which it entirely coincides in forms) or other extraneous influence contributed, does not appear. But later identification with BLEND v.[1] is shown by the occasional use of blynde for this verb also. The 16th c. blenne was either phonetic, like the converse len, lend, or deduced from the pa. pple. blend.]

OE. mildsian, miltsian, ME. MILCE, to be mild, show pity; also, for the formation, OE. rícsian to rule = OHG. rîchisôn:—OTeut. rîkisdjan,* f. rîk-s,* Goth. reiks ruler, king. (An equally satisfactory derivation of blétsian, if it were the original form, would be from blót sacrifice, on O.Teut. type blôtisdjan*; but besides that blédsian actually occurs earlier, the change of ds to ts is phonetically natural, while the reverse is not.) The etymological meaning was thus 'to mark (or affect in some way) with blood (or sacrifice); to consecrate'. But the sense-development of the word was greatly influenced by its having been chosen at the Eng. conversion to render L. benedicere, and Gr. εὐλογεῖν, which started from a primitive sense of 'speak well of or to, eulogize, praise,' but were themselves influenced by being chosen to translate Heb. בָּרַךְ, primarily 'to bend,' hence 'to bend the knee, worship, praise, bless God, invoke blessings on, bless as a deity.' Hence, a long and varied series of associations, heathen, Jewish, and Christian, blend in the Eng. uses of bless and blessing. Senses 4–6 arise mainly from benedicere, εὐλογεῖν. At a very early date the popular etymological consciousness began to associate this verb with the sb. BLISS 'benignity, blitheness, joy, happiness,' which affected the use of both words (see esp. senses 7, 8), and led to occasional ME. spelling of the vb. with i, y.

The pa. t. and pple. are now generally spelt blessed, though always pronounced (blest) in modern prose; the pple. may be pronounced (ble·sĕd) in verse, or liturgical reading. As an adj. blessed (ble·sĕd) is now the regular prose form, but the archaic blest is frequent in verse, and traditional phrases as e.g. 'the Isles of the Blest.']

Orig. meaning (prob.), To make 'sacred' or 'holy' with blood; to consecrate by some sacrificial rite which was held to render a thing inviolable from profane use of men and evil influence of men or demons. (The streaking of the lintel and door-posts with blood, Exod. xii. 23, to mark them as holy to the Lord and inviolable by the destroying angel, was apparently the kind of idea expressed by blédsian in pre-christian times. Cf. also the history of the Latin words consecrāre and sacrificium.) Hence, in historical use:

I. To make sacred, consecrate, hallow.

1. trans. To consecrate (a thing) by a religious rite, the utterance of a formula or charm; in later times by a prayer committing it to God for his patronage, defence, and prospering care, as in to bless food, to ask God's blessing on it (cf. 5).

Blizzard (bli·zărd). U. S. [A modern word, prob. more or less onomatopœic; suggestive words are blow, blast, blister, bluster: the Fr. blesser to wound, has also been conjectured, but there is nothing to indicate a French origin. As applied to a 'snow-squall,' the word became general in the American newspapers during the severe winter of 1880–81; but according to the Milwaukee Republican 4 Mar. 1881, it had been so applied in the Northern Vindicator (Estherville, Iowa) between 1860 and 1870. It was apparently in colloquial use in the West much earlier; but whether Col. Crockett's use of it in 1834 (sense 1) was fig., taken from the stifling blast, or was the earlier sense, and subseq. transferred to the blast, is not determined.]

Bloat, sb. [? from Bloat a.[2] or v.[2]] 'A hammer swelled at the eye.' Raymond Mining Gloss. 1881.

Bloat (blōt), a.[1] Also 3–6 blote, 7 blōate. [The spelling bloat occurs in this sense earlier than in that of next word, with which this is often identified, though in the present state of our knowledge it is safer to keep them distinct. The ME. blote is perhaps identical with ON. blaut-r in the sense 'soft with moisture, soaked, wet'; or from a parallel form blōt-*: cf. the ME. vb. blotne, ON. blotna to soften, moisten (see Bloten), also Sw. blöt soft, moist, yielding. But it would also answer in form to OE. blāt 'livid, pale', though this sense is less likely. Sense 2 recalls ON. blautr fiskr, i.e. 'soft fish', applied to 'fresh' fish, but in Sw. blöt fisk, to 'soaked' fish (Vigf.). Though evidence of actual connexion is wanting, it is conjectured that the Eng. 'bloat herring' is, in some way, identical with these, and means, etymologically, either 'soft (moist) herring', in opposition to 'dried', or else 'soaked, steeped herring', in reference to part of the process of curing the herrings so termed. In Act 18 Chas. II. ii. 'bloated' is opposed to 'dried', and it is explained by Blount as 'half dried'; but most of the quotations give it as meaning (in actual use) 'smoked', (smoking being an important part of the process). One at least (1613 below) appears to identify it with 'puffed up', and thus with sense 2 of the next word, whereas Sylvester, in 1616, says 'Herrings shrink in bloating'; but moist herrings are naturally plumper than those more thoroughly dried. See also next word, and Bloat v.[1]]

Bloat (blōt), a.[2] Forms: 4 bloute, 6–7 blowt(e, 7– bloat. [Apparently distinct at first (as an Eng. word) from the prec., since the earlier form of that was blote, but of this blout; though of parallel origin, and, since the 17th c., identified in form, and often associated in meaning. ME. blout, blowt, was the regular adopted form of ON. blautr soft (as a baby's limbs, a bed, silk; see Vigf.); cf. Sw. blöt 'soft, yielding, pulpous, pulpy'. The later form bloat does not answer phonetically to blout, blowt, yet its modern use is largely owing to the 'blowt king' of Hamlet having been printed 'bloat' by editors since Warburton, 1747; G. Daniel had also spelt the word in this way c 1640–50. Possibly Bloat a.[1] in 'bloat herrings' (found as early as 1602) was in the 17th c. a much better known word than this, and being, rightly or wrongly, identified with it, influenced its form. It is to be noted that Bloat v., and its derivatives Bloated, Bloating, are all of earlier use as applied to the herring, than in senses connected with this word. Sense 2 is a natural enough extension of 1; but it may have been influenced by association with blow, blown; the mutual influence of this and the prec. since 1600, cannot be settled without more definite knowledge of the exact notion at first attached to 'bloat herring'.]

Bloat, v.[1] Also 7 blote. [App. f. Bloat a.[1], with the sense 'to make bloat'.]

trans. To cure (herrings) by a process which leaves them soft and only half-dried. This is now done by leaving them in dry salt on a floor for 24 hours, washing in fresh water, spitting, and smoking them over an oak fire for a period varying from 24 hours to 3 or 4 days, according to the time they are to be kept before being eaten. (Earlier authorities speak of their being steeped for a time in brine before smoking; which has to be remembered in discussing the original meaning of bloat.)

Bloated herrings are opposed to dried or red herrings, which are left in dry salt for 10 days, and smoked for 14 days, whence their deep colour and shrivelled dryness.

Blue blood: that which flows in the veins of old and aristocratic families, a transl. of the Spanish sangre azul attributed to some of the oldest and proudest families of Castile, who claimed never to have been contaminated by Moorish, Jewish, or other foreign admixture; the expression probably originated in the blueness of the veins of people of fair complexion as compared with those of dark skin. Fresh blood: the introduction in breeding of a new strain or stock not related by blood to the family; fig. new members or elements, with new ideas and experiences, admitted to a society or organization.

In general colloquial use from the Restoration to c 1750; now constantly in the mouths of the lowest classes, but by respectable people considered 'a horrid word', on a par with obscene or profane language; and usually printed in the newspapers (in police reports, etc.) 'b— y'.

[The origin is not quite certain; but there is good reason to think that it was at first a reference to the habits of the 'bloods' or aristocratic rowdies of the end of the 17th and beginning of the 18th c. The phrase 'bloody drunk' was apparently = 'as drunk as a blood' (cf. 'as drunk as a lord'); thence it was extended to kindred expressions, and at length to others; probably, in later times, its associations with Bloodshed and murder (cf. a bloody battle, a bloody butcher) have recommended it to the rough classes as a word that appeals to their imagination. We may compare the prevalent craving for impressive or graphic intensives, seen in the use of jolly, awfully, terribly, devilish, deuced, damned, ripping, rattling, thumping, stunning, thundering, etc. There is no ground for the notion that 'bloody', offensive as from associations it now is to ears polite, contains any profane allusion or has connexion with the oath ''s blood!']

Blow (blō[u]), sb.[1] Forms: 5 Sc. and north. blaw, 6 bloe, 6–7 blowe, 6– blow. [First found in 15th c., the earliest instances being Sc. and north. Eng. with form blaw. Origin doubtful.

(The etymology of blow has been naturally sought in the stem of the OTeut. vb. blewwan*, Goth. bliggwan to beat (which is not related to L. flagrō), in OHG. bliuwan, MHG. bliuwen, mod.G. bläuen 'to beetle, batter, beat, drub' (whence bläuel a beetle), MDu. and mod.Du. blou-

cess 'to beat, thrash, drub', now esp. 'to brake or swingle flax or hemp' (whence blowmel a brake for flax). The OE. cognate would have been blówman*, but of this no trace is found, and it is not easy on any theory to understand its giving rise to a substantive in the 15th c. without ever appearing itself. It is still less likely that an English substantive could be formed from the Du. blouwen or its Ger. equivalent, when there is no such substantive in these langs. ('Du. blouw' in J. is a figment.)

Another suggestion which suits the form and accounts also for the early Sc. and north. English variant blaw, is that this is the same word as BLOW sb.[2], or at least, like it, derived from BLOW v.[1] The difficulty is, that, as to the sense, early uses of the word do not indicate any such origin, while historically, BLOW sb.[2] (in its own undoubted senses) is of later appearance. The analogy of Fr. soufflet, also, in which a word for 'a blow with the flat of the hand' arises out of the vb. souffler 'to blow wind', though striking at first sight, proves on examination of the history of soufflet to be merely superficial.)]

Cf. the parallel BLABBER. There is also a dial. Ger. blubbern, said of water casting up bubbles, and a LG. blubbern in herût blubbern to babble or 'blether'. See other analogous forms in Wedgwood. The relation to bubble is seen also in the fact that in north. dial. 'bubble' is used for the vb. in senses 3, 4, as Sc. Blu(e, obs. pa. t. of Blow v.[1]

Blue (blū, blüə), a. Forms: 3 bleu, 3–8 blew, 4 blu(e, bluw(e, 4–5 blwe, 4–6 blewe, 7– blue. [ME. blew, a. OF. bleu, a Common Romanic word (= Pr. blau, blava, OSp. blavo, It. dial. biavo, med.L. blāvus), ad. OHG. or OLG. blâw-:—OTeut. blēwo-z blue, whence also ON. blá-, likewise adopted in ME. as bla, blo, now Blae. The corresponding OE. form blâw (or blēow*) is known only in Erfurt Gloss. 1152, 'blata, pigmentum: haui-b auum', and the derivative blēwen (:—blâwino-) 'perseus'. But neither of these survived into ME., where their place was supplied by the adoption of ON. blá, in sense of 'lividus', and of F. bleu in sense of 'cæruleus'. The OTeut. blēwo- was perh. cognate with L. flāvus yellow (though blēwo-z would be the expected Teutonic form), the names of colours having often undergone change in their application; thus OSp. blavo was 'yellowish-grey'. (The guess that blēwo- was derived from the stem bliuwan*, Goth. bliggwan to beat, as 'the colour caused by a blow' is not tenable.) The present spelling blue is very rare in ME., and hardly known in 16–17th c.; it became common under French influence only after 1700. In pronunciation, nearly all the dictionaries still recognize (blū), but the more easily pronounced (blüə) is general in educated speech.]

Blue-stocking (blū-stǫkiŋ). sb. [As an attributive phrase, with the sense of 'wearing blue stockings', this is found as early as the 17th c. (see 1 a.); in its transferred sense it originated in connexion with re-unions held in London about 1750, at the houses of Mrs. Montague, Mrs. Vesey, and Mrs. Ord, who exerted themselves to substitute for the card playing, which then formed the chief recreation at evening parties, more intellectual modes of spending the time, including conversation on literary subjects, in which eminent men of letters often took part. Many of those who attended eschewed 'full dress'; one of these was Mr. Benjamin Stillingfleet, who habitually wore grey or 'blue' worsted, instead of black silk stockings. In reference to this, Admiral Boscawen is said (Sir W. Forbes Life of Beattie (1806) I. 210 note) to have derisively dubbed the coterie 'the Blue Stocking Society' (as not constituting a dressed assembly). The ladies who supported the reform were at first called Blue Stockingers, Blue Stocking Ladies, and at length, about 1790, when the actual origin of the term was remembered by few, Blue Stockings, in later slang abbreviated to Blues.]

Bluff, sb.[2] Obs. or dial. [Belongs to Bluff v[1]; analogically with bridle, bit, blind, cover, either the verb or the sb. might come first and give rise to the other; here the accessible evidence is in favour of the priority of the verb, though, in the obscurity of the etymology, certainty is not at present possible.]

1. A blinker for a horse.

1777 Darwin Squinting in Phil. Trans. LXVIII. 88 Bluffs used on coach-horses. 1881 Evans Leicestersh. Gloss. (E. D. S.) Bluff, anything used to cover the eyes, such as a blinker for a horse, a board fastened in front of the eyes of a bull or cow to prevent its running, the handkerchief used to bandage the eyes in blind-man's-buff, etc.

2. slang. 'An excuse.' Mayhew Lond. Labour I. 217 (in a list of slang words). ? A false excuse intended to blindfold or hoodwink, a 'blind'.

3. The action of bluffing at cards, in the game of poker; see Bluff v.[1] and cf. Brag. Hence, challenging or boastful language or demeanour, not intended to be carried out, but merely 'tried on' with the design of frightening or influencing an opponent who allows himself to be imposed upon by it. (First used in U. S.)

1848-60 Bartlett Dict. Amer., Bluff, a game of cards. So in Webster 1864. 1866 Harvard Mem. Biographies I. 400 It is a very magnificent game of Bluff that we are playing. 1883 L'pool Daily Post 22 Jan., The whole is a bluff to influence the .. election next week. 1883 Pall Mall G. 3 Nov. 1/1 A bold bit of play in the game of bluff .. between St. Petersburg and Sophia. 1884 Boston (U.S.) Jrnl. 25 Sept., The offer was only a bluff.

Bluff, v.[1] [Immediately related to Bluff sb.[2] 'a blinker for a horse', which, as it appears later than the verb, was presumably named from it, though the reverse is also possible. The etymology is quite unknown: the meaning 'blindfold, hoodwink' does not appear to have any possible connexion with Bluff a. or sb.[1]; the word is probably one of the numerous cant terms (see Bam, Bamboozle) which arose between the Restoration and the reign of Queen Anne. Sense 2 had certainly originally the same meaning; but it looks as if recent users imagined a connexion with Bluff a. or sb.[1], and made it mean 'to blindfold or hoodwink by assuming a fictitious bold front'.]

1. trans. 'To blind-fold or hood-wink'. Bailey.

1674-91 Ray N. C. Wds., Bluff, to blind-fold. 1706 in Phillips. 1721 in Bailey; [so in all edd. to 1800. Not in Johnson, nor in Ash.] 1881 Evans Leicestersh. Gloss. (E. D. S.) s.v. Bluft, 'Ah'm glad yew'n got that theer bull o' yourn blufted.'

2. In the game of poker: To impose upon (an opponent) as to the value of one's hand of cards, by betting heavily upon it, speaking or gesticulating or otherwise acting in such a way as to make believe that it is stronger than it is, so as to induce him to 'throw up' his cards and lose his stake, rather than run the risk of betting against the bluffer. (Of U. S. origin.) Hence, transf. of other wagering, political tactics, international diplomacy, etc. To bluff off: to frighten off or deter (an opponent) by thus imposing upon him as to one's resources and determination.

1864 Sala in Daily Tel. 29 Sept., How can you hope to 'bluff' those who are such consummate masters of the game of brag? 1871 Daily News 4 Jan., The great point .. is the shutting in of Paris, and the 'bluffing off' of France. 1885 N. York Weekly Sun 13 May 2/7 He went his whole heart, soul, and pocket on three aces and was bluffed by his opponent with a pair of trays.

3. intr. To practise or attempt the imposition described in 2; to assume a bold, big, or boastful demeanour, in order to inspire an opponent with an exaggerated notion of one's strength, determination to fight, etc.

1882 Sat. Rev. 1 July 4 Nor is a Government always to be reproached because when it bluffs it fails. Sometimes a great country is entitled to take the benefit of ancient policy of courage, and to see what effect it can produce by the mere terror of its name. 1883 Longm. Mag. Sept. 498 By sheer bluffing—in other words, by lying. 1884 St. James's Gaz. 12 Jan. 4/1 There seems little reason for one party to keep on 'bluffing' when the other party has 'called'.

In the latter case an explanation of blonder as a frequentative of blond, BLAND v., to mix, would well account for the transitive senses. The suggestion that it is a frequentative from Icel. blunda to doze (Sw. blunda to shut the eyes), suits the intransitive senses, but is otherwise doubtful; cf. however BLUND. Perhaps there are really two distinct verbs, with their later senses affected by each other.]

[It is uncertain whether the adj. sense gave its name to the fabric, or whether the name of the fabric was transferred to its colour. The original form of the word is also doubtful, though blunket is both the earliest and by far the most frequent. This makes it doubtful whether it can have been an adoption of OF. blanquet, var. of blanchet, dim. of blanc white (and thus originally the same as Blanket), a derivation which would to some extent suit the sense.]

Blunt (blʌnt), a. and sb. Also 3 Orm. blunnt, 5–6 blont. [Etymology unknown: found in Ormin c 1200, in a sense which has suggested some connexion with ON. blunda to doze, blunda augum to shut the eyes, blundr dozing, sleep (Vigfusson). It has been proposed to explain the form as a contracted pa. pple. for blunded, blund, ON. blundaðr, blundat; but pa. pples. in -nt from -nd are not found so early as 1200; Ormin has none. And this would hardly give the required sense, since blunda was intransitive in ON., and the pple. could hardly exist there. Other suggestions are that blunt might be some kind of side-form of blind, or a nasalized deriv. of an OTeut. root blut-*, whence ON. blautr soft, weak, mod.G. bloss naked, Fris. blat, bleat naked, OE. blēat wretched. But in the present state of the question these are mere conjectures, having no contact with the history of the word.]
